Five Takeaways from the 2024 Fact Book

By David Clarfield

The Investment Company Fact Book is a vital tool in ICI's efforts to provide reliable data to the public discourse surrounding regulated funds. Now in its 64th edition, ICI's flagship product remains the go-to source for policymakers, academics, market participants, and reporters. Whether you're searching for specific statistics, explanations of broader industry trends and developments, or regulatory and policy information, the Fact Book has you covered.

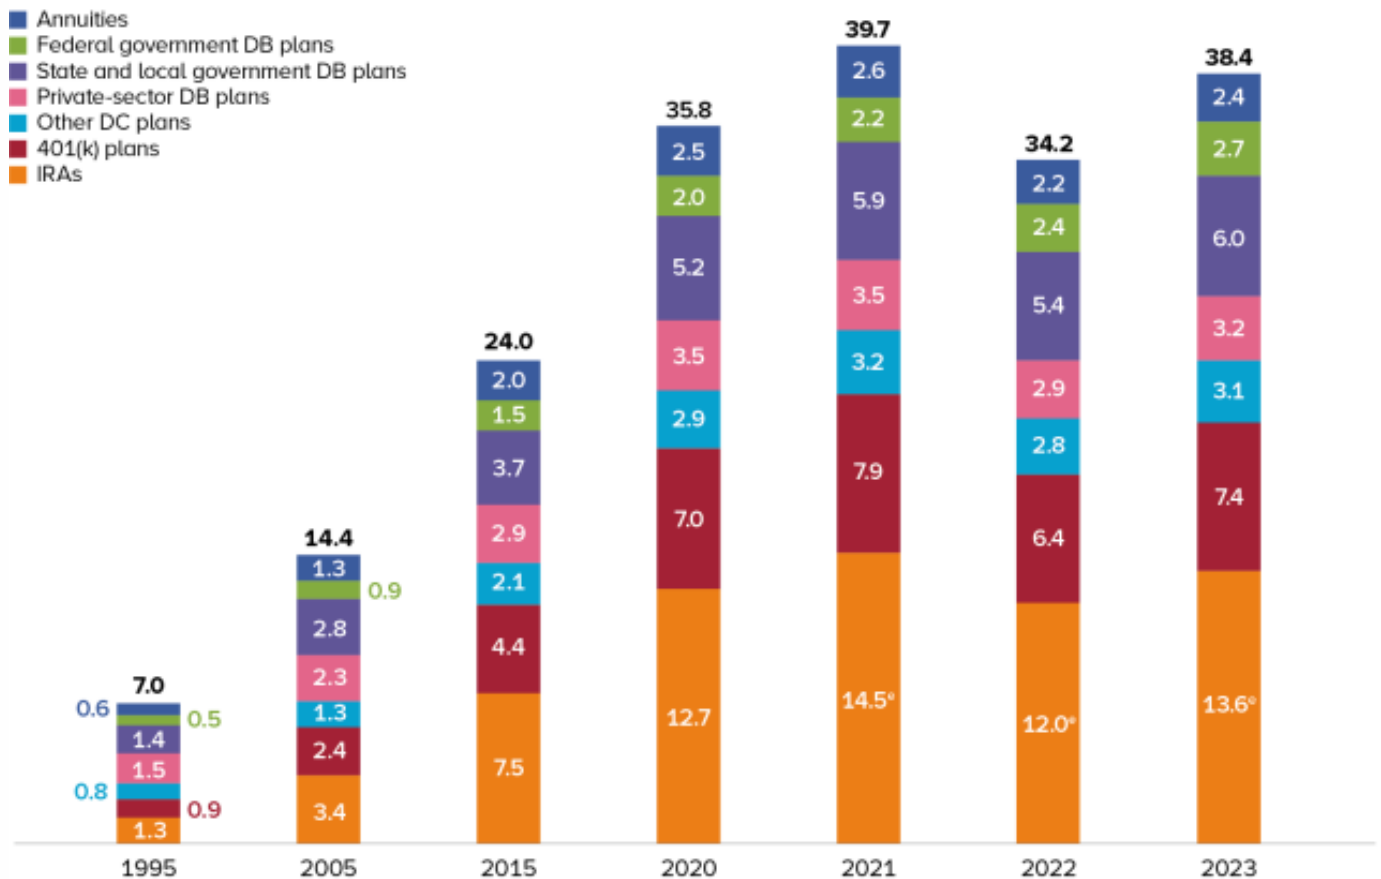

Here are five key takeaways from this year's edition:

IRAs and 401(k)s have fueled the growth of US retirement assets—and Americans are more resilient in retirement as a result.

Total US retirement assets multiplied 4.5 times between 1995 and 2023, fueled largely by IRAs and 401(k) plans. Assets in these individual-based retirement accounts continue to represent a growing share of the US retirement market, reaching 63 percent at the end of last year, up from 58 percent in 2015 and 43 percent in 1995.

Thanks in part to IRAs, 401(k)s, and other types of defined contribution plans, many US retirees maintain the standard of living they had while working, according to a study by ICI economists. Indeed, at every age through age 72, the typical individual maintained more than 90 percent of the inflation-adjusted spendable income they had, on average, from age 55 through age 59.

Demand for long-term funds surged in 2023.

Despite rising geopolitical risks, markets performed strongly in 2023, in large part due to meaningful progress on the inflation front, expectations for interest rate cuts by major central banks, and optimism over emerging AI technologies. With the value of the stocks and bonds underlying regulated long-term funds increasing, worldwide demand for these funds rose sharply, going from net redemptions of $156 billion in 2022 to net sales of $781 billion in 2023.

3 Younger households are well on their way to widespread mutual fund ownership.

Large shares of Millennial households (48 percent) and Gen Z households (35 percent) owned mutual funds in 2023. As ICI research has shown, these younger generations are more engaged in retirement saving and have more than twice the assets—adjusted for inflation—in defined contribution plans compared with earlier generations at the same age.

Mutual Fund Ownership Is Higher Among Older Generations

The market closed up shop on new traditional closed-end funds in 2023, but other types have grown.

Assets in traditional closed-end funds (CEFs) increased last year on the strength of bond and stock market performance. Nevertheless, no new traditional CEFs entered the market amid rising and increasingly concentrated threats from activist hedge funds, which often seek to usurp control of traditional CEFs to generate short-term gains.

On the other hand, the number of interval funds, tender offer funds, and business development companies—the three other types of CEFs—each increased, as did their assets, as they have for several years. With nontraditional CEFs continuing to flourish, total assets in these funds climbed to $296 billion by the end of 2023, more the double the amount just three years earlier.

Investors continued to reap the benefits of declining expense ratios.

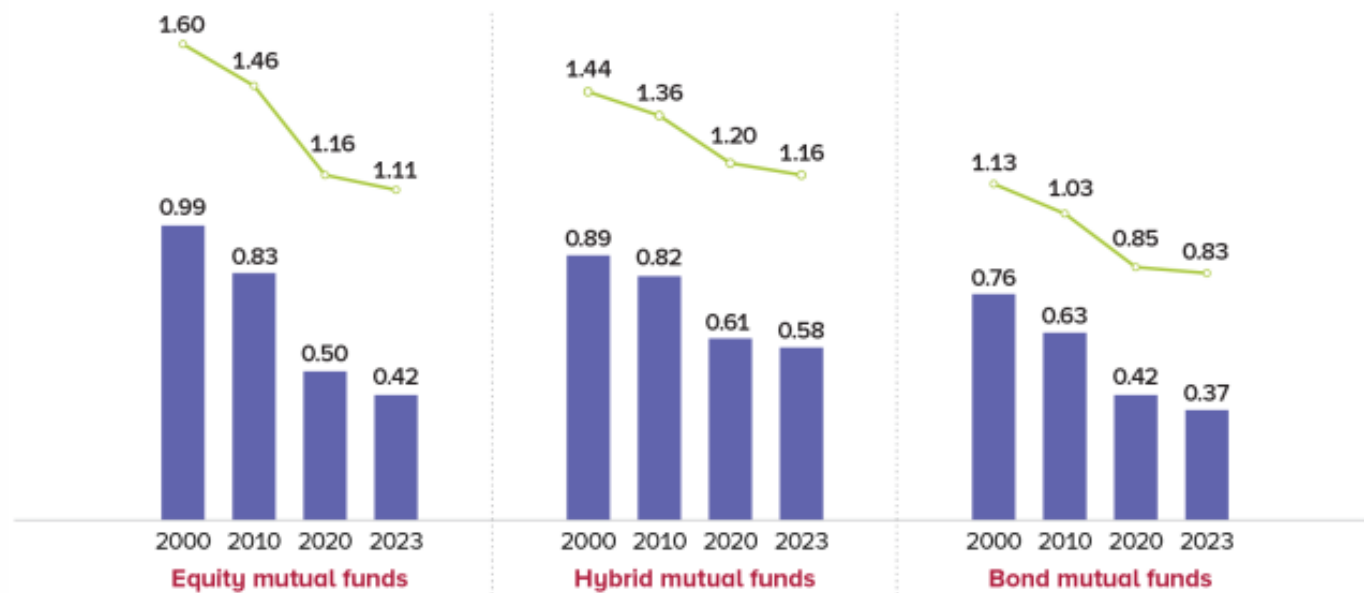

On an asset-weighted basis, average expense ratios incurred by mutual fund investors have fallen substantially, allowing shareholders to keep a greater portion of their investment gains. In 2000, equity mutual fund investors incurred expense ratios of 0.99 percent, on average, or 99 cents for every $100 invested. By 2023, that average had fallen to 0.42 percent, a 58 percent decline. Hybrid and bond mutual fund expense ratios also declined over this period, dropping 35 percent and 51 percent, respectively.

What has driven this shift? Investor demand, intense competition in the industry, and economies of scale.
